Zombie Training Simulator Activation [March-2022]

Long ago, World War III broke out and you were a grunt on a Marine's side. You were on your way to carry supplies to an outpost in a dangerous war zone. Your team asked you to leave the supply truck and walk into a valley to assist in a mission. During your journey into the valley, a crater in the mountain side caused a landslide. Now, you are trapped in a collapsed cavern. Your team members have been captured, the enemy is closing in, and the only way out is through the collapsed cavern. Can you make it through the collapsed cavern to safety? Can you survive? This is likely to be useful.

However, our results have clear limitations. Firstly, although sensitivity and specificity were high, the correlation between the MRI and surgical findings was moderate, as already noted, which indicates the need for a reproducibility study. Secondly, the type of stenosis was not examined in our study, and there was no attempt to differentiate between true and extraluminal stenosis. Thirdly, all patients had significant co-morbidities and were highly symptomatic (range of blood pressures 144/86 to 168/92 mm Hg). These conditions are likely to affect their cochlear health and are likely to be confounding factors in the MRI interpretation. Finally, there were no matched temporal bone controls in this study; therefore, we cannot rule out the possibility of some other factor as the cause of the MRI abnormality. There is also a lack of literature data describing concomitant temporal bone pathology in middle ear disease. Future studies will be needed to establish whether different disease causes can result in similar pathology.

CONCLUSIONS {#sec1-5} ===== The established medical consensus is that the majority of patients with atresia of the Eustachian tube have systemic disease manifesting with a more severe and often life-threatening clinical picture. \[[@ref13][@ref33]\] This study is the first to describe the potential importance of cochlear pathology in such a condition, and indicates that imaging the middle ear and cochlea may give false-positive results, and as a result, asymptomatic patients may be pursued unnecessarily. We suggest that patients undergoing bimodal assessments of suspected MEE be carefully selected, when possible, on the basis of a negative physical examination and audiogram.
