For any technical assistance.Heterogeneity of effect of nitric oxide in the production of cGMP in rat aorta. Nitric oxide (NO) has the potential to serve as a local arterial dilator, a systemic arterial vasodilator, and as a vascular smooth muscle relaxant. However, in vascular smooth muscle cells (VSMC) NO acts via a variety of guanylate cyclase-linked pathways, producing effects that depend on the intracellular location and the activating factor. Therefore, we hypothesized that NO released from different sources could have different effects on the VSMC cGMP level. We observed that in the aortic rings from rats, NO donors (SIN-1, SNAP, and S-nitrosoglutathione) and NOS stimulated cGMP production. Different cellular sources of NO produced significantly different effects on cGMP production. Additionally, the cGMP responses to NO donors in the aortic rings from rats depended on incubation time and incubation medium, indicating that NO-induced cGMP production can be also influenced by extracellular matrix components and other substances in the incubation medium. The responses to NO donors were different in rat aorta depending on the vascular bed studied, being minimal in the mesenteric, but maximal in the thoracic aorta. In addition, the effects of NO donors were significantly different in the aorta from rats with essential hypertension (EH) and in that from normotensive rats (WR), suggesting the involvement of different mechanisms in the regulation of cGMP production in rat
