Based on scaling arguments, LAMH theory, and Monte Carlo simulations we investigate a magnetically driven un-packing transition of a two-dimensional system consisting of a large array of interacting clusters, each of which contains a number of magnetic ions. The packing is characterized by a bond percolation property. When the external magnetic field is turned on, the clusters can be un-packed leading to a drastic increase of the probability of broken bonds. The field-induced un-packing can be understood as a percolation transition of the clusters in the system. Numerical results obtained from Monte Carlo simulations and scaling arguments are in good agreement with theoretical predictions.Margot Zinke has written a book about the federal land her father used
